WHAT IS A PATIENT-CENTERED MEDICAL HOME?

A patient-centered medical home is a medical practice in which a team of health professionals work together to provide all of your health care needs.

We use technology such as electronic medical records to communicate and coordinate your care so that you have the best possible outcomes.

You, the patient, are the most important part of a patient-centered medical home.

At Gonzales Community Health Center, our goal is to ensure that each patient's individual care is met in the right way, at the right time, at the right location and by the right provider.

Our Patient-Centered Medical Home (PCMH) exists for that very reason.

This team-based model of care, led by a primary care physician, provides continuous and coordinated care to ensure the highest level of healthcare.

Your physician-led PCMH team works together to provide high quality care, backed by medical evidence, increased access to providers, clear communication and care coordination with your other healthcare providers

This team coordinates all of a patient's health needs, including management of chronic conditions, visits to specialists, hospital admissions, and information about preventative screenings, check-ups, tests and care advice during business hours as well as a 24-hour call service.

The ultimate goal of the Patient-Centered Medical Home model is to achieve the highest quality of care.
